Scoring and Interpretation Information

A total raw score ranging from 5 to 35 indicates the overall level of therapeutic alliance. In addition, scores are presented as “mean scores”, indicating the average responses (from 1 to 7). A percentile rank is presented using the mean and standard deviation from the Cahil et al. (2011) sample, indicating the level of alliance compared to a normative sample. The percentile should be interpreted with caution, however, given the data is significantly skewed with evident ceiling effects (max percentile = 91.4).

Research shows there is minimal psychometrically significant distinction between the three subscales (Bond, Partnership and Confidence). Therefore clinicians are encouraged to use the total alliance score, which is the most reliable and useful measure.

Bond (item 1) is the measure that encompasses the classic dimensions of client-therapist bond and feelings of therapist supportiveness.

Partnership (items 2 and 3) measures agreement on tasks, and agreement on goals.

Confidence (items 4 and 5) measures the client's confidence in the treatment approach, as well as the perceived confidence the therapist has in their own techniques. Confidence has been identified as the strongest predictor of positive outcome, reflecting the therapist's and client's joint sense of progress and investment.
